P.

P, p, Roman, P, p, Italic, 𝔓, 𝔭, English black letter, but of no great antiquity, nor indeed use, the Roman and Italic character having prevailed not only with us, but generally through Europe. The figure of this, as indeed of all the Roman letters, was anciently the same with the Grecian, as Pliny informs us, and is confirmed by ancient monuments. And indeed it is still but very little different, which may be seen, as in the rest, so particularly in this letter, P being only Γ with the transverse and depending line drawn semicircular. And indeed the Greek Π itself differs no more, scarcely so much, from its original the Hebrew final ף when turned towards the right. The name of this letter is the same in English, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, פה pe, signifying in that tongue a mouth, which the figure somewhat represents. Its place is the fifteenth letter in the English and Roman alphabets, and the first in the first order of the mutes, wherein is a frequent permutation because of their nearness in sound and use; for p is only a softer b, as b a harder p. The ancient Latins wrote Burrhus for the Greek Πυῤῥος, and in their own language sometimes were at a stand whether to write b or p; as in the instance of Fabius, whether obtineo, or optineo, since more of this than that was heard in pronunciation. This is also proportionably demonstrated in their very figure, P being half of B. Nay, that they have actually changed b into p in many words for this reason only, will be evident in declining verbs ending in bo, and bor, of the third conjugation, as in nubo, scribo, labor, wherein the harder sound b, when a consonant is to follow, is changed into the softer, p; and this not only in declining such words, but this p from b remains also in their participles, verbal nouns, and derivatives, as from scribo, scriptus, scriptura, scriptio, scriptito, &c. Their near affinity, in the learned languages especially, leads us into the derivation of words wherein they are found. Thus we deduce the etymology of pario, and precor, from the Hebrew ברא and ברך; thus the Latin palpebra and pubes, from the Greek βλεφαρον and βεβων, and vice versâ; ab and sub from απο and ὑπο. This their proximity in nature, sound, and use, is excellently denoted in their Greek and Latin figures, Π and P, representing one half of B. Nor is p changed only into b its middle sound, but also into its aspirate φ, especially in declining verbs and nouns, as is plain in λειβω, λειπσω, λελειφα, where we find β before a vowel changed into π before a consonant, (as was before noted in Latin verbs of the same termination,) and π again changed into φ. So in κατηλιπε, ιφυς, ιφι, &c. gryps, gryphis, i, &c. and on the contrary φ in etymologies is changed into p, as Περσεφονη, Proserpina. To this first order of the mutes belong f and v, into which p is also changed, as πηγω, figo; πειθω, fido; pilus, filum; and as from λεπις, levis, so on the contrary from ovis, opilio. Nor does p refuse the intercourse of her sisters of the second order; hence is lepus from λαγως, lupus from λυκος; nor of q which belongs to this order: For from επτομαι, Æol. πεκομαι, comes equus: ποτε, Ion. κοτε, quoties: πη, Ion. κη, qua. The correspondence of this mute with the sisterhood of the third rank is visible in σπουδη, studium; περαω, trans; as on the contrary in appeto, applico, &c. Eo adipeto, adipiscor. Some kindred between p and the liquids is also averred by etymologists, but which is, in my opinion, precarious, as too far removed to be depended upon. In pure Latin words this mute only precedes l and r, as plaga, promo: but in Greek words, or of Greek extraction, h, n, s, t, as phasma, philus, phaniticus; dysphnæa; psephisma, psilæ; Ptolemæus, diptoton. Here it may be proper to note, that when the Latins enfranchise a Greek word in which pt begins a syllable, they leave out either the former or latter, writing cubo, perna, tussis, for κυπτω, περνα, πτισσω. In the middle of words, p admits before it three of the liquids, l, m, r; as culpa, campus, carpo; n also, but always by her proxy m, as compleo, compono, for conpleo, conpono. In derivatives from Greek the initial p is sometimes omitted, as in latus from πλατυς, uro from πυρω; which however seems to appear in comburo for compuro. This letter seems also sometimes to be inserted in some Latin words derived from Greek, to hinder the collision of two vowels, as in lapis from λαας, dapes from δαις. P. in the notes of the ancients, is read, Publius, pondo; P. DIG. Patricia dignitas; P. C. Patres conscripti; P. F. Publii filius; P. P. Propositum, Propositum publice; P. R. Populus Romanus; PR. S. Prætoris sententia; PRS. P. Præses provinciæ.

Q, q, Latin, Q, q, Ital, 𝔔, 𝔮, black English. Concerning the origin, power, and use of this letter, the ancient Latin writers have delivered various opinions to the modern critics. Some of them took it to be superfluous, and therefore probably were unconcerned about it, how or whence it came into their alphabet. Of this number were Nigidius Figulus and Licinius Calvus, who refused to use it at all. Some used c for it indifferently, and wrote pequnia, loquntur, obliguum, and at other times pecunia, locuntur, oblicum. Vid. Silburg. de Vet. Rom. Script. Hence some learned moderns, finding many words of this kind, others again judging it to be no letter, but only a combined note of cu, must consequently have supposed vulgar custom, and a shorter way of writing, to have introduced it into the alphabet. Of this number was Pompeius Festus, and long before him Ennius, who wrote sometimes cuando, and sometimes quando. And indeed custom at this day allows to write cocus, hircus, cum, cur, colidie, and many others, or coquus, hirquus, quum, &c. promiscuously. From such examples, and the frequent changes of each of these into the other, as in coquo, coctum, liqui, lictum, &c, which is no more than an ordinary permutation in letters of the same organ, especially in mutes of the same rank, some have not only affirmed Q to be CV combined as aforesaid, but showed us the separate parts in this figure, C ⊰. These wrote sometimes, qis, qæ, qid, or cuis, cuæ, cuid, which Vossus approved. Quintilian on the contrary takes the figure of this letter, as well as the power, from K, and seems to think both letters superfluous. As to the figure, it is just as probable as the former; and as to its power, nothing can be proved from that known pun of Cicero, Ego quoque tibi jure favebo; because Donatus having informed us that in Cicero's time quoquus was written, it is more probable that he pronounced that word quoque than koke. My arguments for this conjecture are chiefly from Fabius himself, who tells us (Lib. XII. 10.) this letter made syllables harsh; which surely cannot well agree to the sound of k. Besides, he says in the same place, that Q had a sound unknown to the Greeks, (which certainly it had, and for that reason not adopted in their alphabet, of which more below,) which evidently proves the Romans sounded it not as k, but very probably as we do. But what neither the ancient writers nor the modern were aware of, has not escaped the sagacity of the learned Dr. Littleton, who has deduced the figure, name, and power of this letter from ק. For as from the Hebrew Caph, the Greeks made Kappa, so from koph, koppa; but finding they had no occasion for it in their alphabet, gave it however a place among their numerals, calling it κοππα επισημον. For the same reason also, Vau, not being admitted as a letter, found place as a numeral, by the name of βαυ επισημον. On the very same account, tzade, or zade, or as we call it zad, was denied the favour of being a letter, but assigned a proper place in their numbers. This proceeding may plainly be accounted for from the genius of both languages. The Hebrew being harsher, made use of four letters in each rank of the mutes, namely, two medials in each order; the sound of the one so differing from its neighbour, as the first from the last: the two medials in the first order were ב and ו, or B and V; in the second ג and ק, or G and Q. In the third ד and ט, or D and Z. But the smoother tongue of the Greeks refusing the latter in each order, made them amends suitable to their rank, placing the first in their units, the second in their tens, and the third in their hundreds. But to proceed, the old Romans, whose language was perhaps not much softer than the Hebrew, though they framed their alphabet from the Greek, found themselves obliged to restore these numeral marks to the dignity they had enjoyed in the mother alphabet. And thus from Βαυ, or which is the same, the Æolian digamma ϝ, made their F, that people alone of all the Greeks having learned that sound; and from the Greek Κοππα their Q. This letter, I observe, the Latins must have sounded quoppa, if the opinion of several ancient and modern critics may be allowed, who affirm this letter to be taken in purely for the sake of its V, to give it a broader sound, as it is very probable the original ק had in Hebrew to distinguish it from כ, whence the Greeks had their Καππα, and mediately the Latins their K. From the third επισημον, Σαμπι, which, as before noted, was the Hebrew tsade, or as we call it, zad, their z was taken, not from the Greek Ζητα; for here I am forced to recede from the learned Doctor, because the Latin z has a very hard sound, as the dental ϑ has, whereas the Greek Ζητα was so soft, that Fabius tells us, the Roman orators were obliged to borrow it from them sometimes, to avoid using their own barbarous z, that is the Hebrew ז, which the Greeks had not, Lib. XII. 10. and in the same place will scarce allow י, that is, F, to have a humane sound; which surely is softer than ϑ; and the opinion he had of our Q, I have shown before. Hence it is evident, that the Latin z is not the Greek ζ; and that the orator dislikes as letters all the three Επισημα: and the Doctor confesses the figure of Z comes nearer ϡ, and the small z nearer to the final ץ, than to the Greek ζ. But to return to our Q. The figure of Q is easily made from C|, by shutting the semicircle, and obliquating the perpendicular line; and C|quoppa, differs not at all from the Hebrew ק, when, in compliance to the western way of writing, it is turned to the right. Thus at length the figure, name, and power, of this letter are settled. But whereas the learned Doctor roundly affirms the Greeks had formerly this letter; I cannot here but avow my dissent, since it neither appears among the Cadmean letters, nor those invented, whether necessary or compendiary: besides he owns the Greeks did not want it. Yea, Quintilian farther observes, that they could not pronounce it, and is angry that so broad and harsh a sound should be taken into the Latin alphabet, which so embased the Roman, when compared with the Greek elocution. I should next show its mutual intercourse with its sister mutes; but I have already made the longest preface to one of the shortest letters, and therefore shall only observe, that the resemblance and sound of this mute is nearer to that of her medial sister G, than to C or K her other sisters. For G takes V after her before a vowel, in the same syllable sometimes, as in lingua, extinguo, &c. as Q does always: which v, whether it be a vowel or a consonant, or neither, as Donatus and others have thought, I had better inquire in that letter than here. R

R, r, Greek Ῥ, ρ, Hebr. ר Resch, from רֹאשׁ a head, which the figure in some sort represents, in Syriac ראי Roe, from which the Greek Ῥ, Rhô. From this letter the learned Littleton is of opinion that the Latins, whether by mistake or design, took the figure of their R, as also the smaller r, by curtailing the larger; and that after they had inserted Q from the Hebrew, and considered that the figure of the Greek rho was the very same with their P, for distinction, an appendage or tail was by them added to it. But undoubtedly he is mistaken in this part of his conjecture. For we are certain from their monuments still remaining, that the most ancient Greeks had both Ῥ and R in their alphabet: witness the Baudelotian monument, and the pillars of Herodes Atticus, that famous critic and antiquary, vid. Grut. Inscript. p. 27. where we find this form, R, at least seven times; to omit what both Pliny and Tacitus acquaint us with, that the figure of the Latin letters was almost the same with that of the ancient Greeks. It seems more probable to me, that the Latins observing the Greeks to have two characters for one sound, which they had not in the rest, viz. P and R, took the former of them into their alphabet for their P, judging this figure most significant of the power of half the B, as P is. If none has made this easy conjecture before, it must have happened by not observing the ancient Greeks had R as well as P to characterize their rhô. This letter, R, is in the alphabet put last of all her sister liquids, undeservedly, being indeed των ἡμιφωνων γενναιοτατον, as Dionysius Halicarnass. calls it; and might pretend to the first place, since, though not fully, yet more of it may be sounded without a vowel than any of the rest. Add to this, that in the Greek tongue it makes a syllable pure, and takes before it an aspiration: both which privileges belong to vowels. Whether the aspiration ought to be sounded before or after this letter, is not agreed on: reason, and the custom of the Æolians, who prefixed sometimes ϱ and sometimes β before it, makes for the former opinion; and the use of the Latins, who write rhamnus, rhetor, rhinoceros, rhombus, &c. may seem to countenance the latter. But I observe that in words of Greek extraction the Latins often neglected this aspiration, as in radix, rigeo, rosa, and in other words at pleasure either omitted or inserted it, as in raphanus, and rhaphanus, romphæa, or rhomphæa. The Hebrews gave this letter the right of a guttural, never doubling it at all; and indeed this sound is formed in the upper part of the throat, but so as vibrated by a quaver of the tongue and allision on the teeth, it makes a sound like the grinning of a dog, whence it is called the canine letter: but the Romans, on the contrary, gave it so soft and lisping a sound, that in writing they sometimes omitted it, calling the Etrusci Thusci, or Tusci; and especially before s; thus Ennius wrote prosus, rusus, for prorsus, rursus: which is less to be wondered at, because the most ancient Latins doubled not their consonants. Yea, the sound of this lisped r was so near that of its neighbour s, that they wrote asa, casmen, Papysii, for ara, carmen, Papyrii; and we find the termination os, as well as or, in good writers still; as, particularly in the prince of poets, arbos and honos frequently occur; and labos, vapos, &c. in others. But the soft sound of this letter is in nothing more plain, than its interposition to hinder the collision of two vowels, as if it had been little more than a breathing, as in murex, murus, from μυαξ, υνος. But to proceed: Though the Grammarians call all the liquids immutables, they are often changed reciprocally into one another; and to say nothing of the rest here, this has not only an intercourse with the sisterhood, but often with several of the mutes. First with her sister l, as from puer, puera, puella; so from κανθηλιος is made cantherius; and as cælulius was anciently written for caruleus, so on the contrary latiaris for latialis. With her sister m the instances are more rare; but common enough with n: for as from ὄφρυς, and πλήρης, are domum and plenus, so from ποινος, Æol. πεινος, and from μοινα, are merus and mora. In some words r or n are written indifferently, as in aveus or aveus. I will instance as briefly as I can the intercourse of this liquid with some of the mutes; with c, as paucus from παυρος; with d, meridies from medidies, querquedula for querquerula, from querquerus; and anciently ar in many words was used for ad, as in arlabi, arfinis, arvorsus, for adlabi, &c. with g, as from αρνη, agna, so seges from serere. This letter by poets is used in describing motion, noise, indignation, or violence. Vid. Voss. Inst. Orat. 4. 2. R. in the notes of the ancients, R. vel RO signifies Roma; R.
